The Famous and Renowned

HISTORY

Of the Two Unfortunate, though Noble LOVERS,

Hero and Leander:

Giving an Account of all that happened from the beginning of their Loves, till both of them Ended their Lives in the Sea, for Love of each other.

Their Various Adventures, and the Renowned Atchivements of Leander, in his many Glorious Victorys & Successes, till he was forbid Access to the Fair Here, by her Cruel Father, upon his killing his Rival in a Combat. Also how (she being Imprisoned in a Tower) he Swam over the Sea to Visit her, & in a boistrous Storm was drowned, for the sorrow of which, she leaped into the waves & drowned her self.

Printed by A. Mi bourn, for T. Blare, at the Looking- Class on Lord in Tride

To the READER.

He Famous Story of the Loves, and Unfortunate Deaths of Hero and Learider, has been so much the Subject of Poetry, and other Learned Authors, that I think there are but few People that have not heard little or more of it: Though indeed, the particulars of the beginning and end of their loves, has, to many, been left in the dark, as being written in Foreign Languages, who have celebrated their Memories as the most Constant Lovers that ever were. Wherefore, that our English Nation may not be left in Ignorance, I have though late, drawn it into a small compass, though very much to the purpose, containing much variety and delight, so that it may be accounted the perfection of History, dressed in a Method, that cannot but please, wherein the Pasfions of Lovers are expressed to the heighth, and the various dangers they meet withal, and strugle with, and although Virtuous Love be sometimes Unfortunate, it never misses of praise, and due commiseration, and moves a generous compassion in the hearts. Wherefore, not doubting but it will do so in those that shall, as well as those that have heard of it; I commend it to your perusal, as the choisest of Historys, and remain

Your very Humble Servant, to Command,

F. 5.

Ho

bachis

all

the

Be

up

pa

or

W

CC

Ce

fo

as ej

0 t

1

The Famous and Renowned History Of the Two Unfortunate, though Noble Lovers Hero and Leander, &c.

CHAP. I.

How Leander, returning in Triumph from his Eastern Victories, fell in Love with the Beautious Hero, and she in Love with him; and of the strange Vision of the Goddess Venus appearing to Horo, and what the represented, &c.

not in-

as

mo-

OUT

ivn

ing of afbey

re-

nd

11t

Hen Greece flourished in Riches and Renown, becoming, by Vertue, and Valorous Atchivements, the Glory of the whole World, having subdued to it felf, not only the Persian Empire, but almost all India, & indeed the most part of Asia; Then it was that the Famed Leander, after many Warlike Exploits, and bringing into Subjection divers Countries, as General of the Greeian Forces, coming back with his Victorious Army, Adorned with Lawres, and Trimmphs, had his Praises sung every where. Whilst the Crowding Spectators flowed from all parts to behold him as he passed in his Triumphant Chariet. And amongst the rest of the Asian Beauties, the fairest of her Sex, and even the very Mirror of Beauty, Hero, Daughter to a Prince who had a stately Castle called Sestus, scienate upon the banks of the Helespont, or narrow Sea, of about two miles over, that parts Europe from Asia, the that day was adorned in the Richest Attire that Gold or Siks, or lewels could fet out to the highest Illustration, glistering like the morning Star, or a Goddess in a Radiant Cloud, she was in a Chariet drawn by four white Horses in Silver Trapings, and shaddowing Plumes of Feathers of various colours, attended by a train of Servants, dreffed in the Richest Garments that could be found, and with her, as her Companions, were divers Beautiful Virgins. fo that the appeared like Diana, furrounded with her Nimphs, yet out thining them as far as the Sun does the glimering Stars. This Object foon made Lear der fix his eyes upon it with Admiration, and though he had divoted himself to the God of War, and gave Nations Laws, yet now the God of Love put in to gain a Victory over him, who had been esteemed unconquerable, the Queen of Love seemed to guide his thoughts, and take up all his cogitations, he wished he might lay his Lawrels and Trophies at this fair Ladys feet, and found an inward fire kindled. that made him love this fair Stranger, before he knew what the was, or what Quality, yet could guess by all that appeared, she was no less than Noble, when his Triumphant Chariot had passed her, he could not but turn his Eyes back to behold her, and, like the Love-fick Son to his fair and beloved Lencothe, was loath to go out of her fight, he thought once or twice to order his Attendants to enquire who the was, but then other thoughts countermanded them, when he confidered that his Fame and Glory would be Eclipsed, if, just returning from the Wars of Mars, he should be suspected to Encline to the soft Tents of Venus, so that without any inquiry, coming to the Sea-shore, he Embarqued his Victorious Army on the ships that lay ready to Transfort him into Greece, and immediately, the fails being sill'd with a prosperous Gale, whilst Neptune and his Trytons danced before him, he reached the Joyful Shore, filled with People from all parts, who came to welcome him with Musick and Songs, loudly with shouts of Joy, proclaming his welcome, and thronged after him to his Castle, or Pallace of Abidos, where his Father and Mother with open Arms received him, and all the States of Greece came to congratulate his Success, proclaming aloud his Victorys, and held ten days selfitival in their Capital Cays, in honour of his many brave Exploits and Atchivements over so many several Nations.

A 2

Ou

Leander, during the General Rejoycing, was thoughtful in disposing his Army, and setting his Affairs, which being done, he thought to betake himself to repose after the tedious toils of War, but the beautious Hero, whose Idea or Form, continually seemed to be in his sight, opposed it, he thought she was always in his sight, for sleeping or waking, his fancy and his dreams represented her unto him all Lovely and Charming, so that he could no longer stifle his Flame, but he signally shewed by the Asteration of his Countenance, that something inwardly disturbed him; his Parents and Friends wondered at so sudden a change, and not knowing the cause, urg'd him to discover it, but he being very prudent, put them off with sictions.

While Leander was at this pass, the fair Here no less surprized with the fight ofhim, represented to herself all that was great and worthy to be admired in mankind, in him, so that their flames and passions were Equal, though either was Ignorant of it, she was so taken up with the thoughts of him, that she bated much of her natural rest, & was pleased with nothing more than to hear the great actions he had done, the relation of which was musick to her Ears, and joy to her Heart, and often the would ask Amphilia her Nurse, who had brought her up, and in whom the alone confided, what the had heard of the famous Grecian Captain fince he had passed the Sea. This Woman being of a ready and quick understanding, found by the young Ladys often changing colour, and sometimes letting a figh escape when the fooke of Leander, that the had a more than ordinary concern for him, refolving to dive more deeply into her thoughts, she urged her many times to know, why the fo earnefly enquired after the fame and welfare of this perfon above all otheis, but the answered her either with filence, or that the did no more in it, than every body did of so brave a man. But one night Amphila being to watch in the chamber of fair Here, whole inward fire had, by burning too fierce, fomewhat di-Rempred her health, the heard her in her flumber cry out : Oh! how Cruel is the

Oce

Wi

on ed wit

God

he

Of the Two Unfortunate Lovers, Hero and Leander.

vho

that ars,

nny

il'd im, velvelFato
ilints

ny, ofe onhis im
lly

he. ns.
ht

ch

ns

t,

m b d e

e-

٧,

)-

n

d

he scarce had said this, when she fanoyed in her dream, as she afterward declared, he beheld Leander standing by her in a most lovely and charming shape, and the Goddess Venus as it were presenting him to her with these words:

Behold fair Maid what you desire,
His brest I've sill'd with equal fore, Both shall enjoy what either Craves,
Till Love is quench'd in Neptunes VV oves.

Having thus said, Leander seem'd to embrace her, and she him, very tenderly with Ardent Affection, when a great Sea of Water seemed to flow into the place on a sudden and parted them, at which she starting between sleep and wake, cryed as in a fright: O my Leander, my love, how or where have I lost you; and so awoke with Rose Blushes on her Cheeks, and tears in her eyes, and being told of this by Amphilia, she could no longer deny her love, whereupon she promised her her best Assistance, which she faithfully performed, as will hereafter appear.

A CONTRACTOR OF THE PARTY OF TH

A:

CHAP.

The Famous and Renowned History

CHAP. II.

How I cander paffed the Sea to profecute his Love with Hero, and by what means he delivered her and her Father from death, and flew a great number of their Enemies the badbefet them in a Wood, and afted many other frange winders.

Ove having gained thus a double Conquest, and both the Lovers ignorant of Leach others passion, Leander grew imparient, casting many ways in his mind, how he might come to the speech, or at least the fight of his fair Bero, whose is mage had made so deep an impression in his heart. & after some wavering of mind religived to pass over into 'Asia, as a private Person to wait there a while for a favourable opportunity of feeing his beloved Mistress; he could see her Castle from the Shoar of Europe, to which he had often waiked for that purpose, and would often cry out: O happy Walls, who contain fo In stimable a Beauty, even the Glory of her Sex, and marcoless perfections of Women kind, wishing himself the happiness, the sence. less Marble unthinkingly contained by circling her in its circumference, and fecuting her when the took her feft flumbers and Repole, but long he debated not before he put his resolves in practice, and going to aprivate Harbor between two Rocks somewhat distant from Abidas, without the knowledge of his Relations, and finding a small Bark there, he agreed with the Master to Transport him to the further flore, which he did with a favourable gale, and Landed him by the fide of a Forrest, some distance from Sestus, the Castle of his beloved Hero, where having difinified the Mafter of the Bark with a Reward futable to his Labour, he fat him down under a spreading shade, to consider the best methods to be taken without giving offence.

Long he had not stayed there, e're, at a great distance, he heard the cry of Hounds, and the shout of Huntsmen, which by degrees dres nearer, yet his thoughts gai wholly taken up with love, was little affected with the polline, and therefore to the avoid it he was turning another way to some little houses, that stood at the bottom of a Hill in a Valley, when after some silence, he heard grievous out-crys, as of People in diffress, and immediately a man all bloody and wounded, came running out of the Forrest, whereupon mounting his horse he had brought with him, he came up to this miferable Person, and demanded who had so misused him, to whom with a faint voice, he reply'd, Certain Pyrates, lying in Ambush in the Forrest, had fer upon Prince Armelius and his Train, and had killed many of them, yet those, that re-Hained, valiantly defended their Prince: Therefore, for God's fake, Sir, said he to Leander, if you are generous, baften to his affiftance e're it is to late.

Leander, who had always a Noble Soul, and took great delight to relieve the diffressed, need not be incited to such an Enterprize, set Spurrs to his Horse, being directed to the place by the crys that continued, and found the Prince, most of whose men were slain, valiantly desending himself, his back being to a Tree a-gaint

ma

Ar

lay

WO

Lea

car

wa

ner

but dy.

rie

110

ILC El

Of the Two Unfortunate Lovers, Hero and Leander

ris he 79:1CS

t of ind, se i. nind a fa. rom bluc fber ncefe. not two ons. the of a ing him out v of om

ning

he lom had

re-2 10

the 1118

t of

: ainft

this gainst nine or ten of these, he casily perceived who the oppressors were, and who the oppressed, and flying in amongst them like a Tempest, beat all down before him, e to cutting off the heads of some, and the Arms of others as they were about to strike, s of making their Swords drop useless from their hands, this put new Courage into Armelius, and his wounded men, who yet survived their fellows, so that lastity laying about them, all but three of these Pyrates were slain, who, being likewise wounded, escaped among the trees. Armelius had scarce time to thank the Generous. Leander, when hearing the crys of his Daughter, whom other of this rout were carrying away Prisoner, he besought him on his knees to bend his course thitherward, and help to rescue her. Leander, now all covered with the blood of his Enemies, turning his Horse to the path, sollowed the cry, and soon over took them, but Oh! what Amazement and wonder feized him, when he faw, and knew this Lady, the' in Tears, and difordered; and torn Hair and Garments, to be the Beautions Hero, he lifted up his hand to Heaven for directing to this Forrest, and time when the fairest of creamics, and joy of his life was in such danger, and with a great cry, incited by love and revenge, fell upon them like a Thunder-bolt, breaking from a Cloud, dying afresh his Sword, not dryed from the former blood, whilst the tiembling bling Lady almost dyed away to see such fatal stroaks, which at every turn brough death to one or other of em, fo that disparing to carry off their precious prize when defended by one whom they supposed to be much more than man, those that his could, fled, and those that could not; left their lives behind them.

da By this time Armelius and his company were come up to lend what affiftance they could, and feeing fair Hero Rescued, they would have fallen as the feet of their fer Deliverer, but he Generously with held them from doing, alledging that he had done nothing but what all Good and Just men, ought to hazard in such Cases to refour the oppressed, and punish the oppressor, by this time the Alarm being taken, a great Crowd of People came flocking from the Nighbouring Parts, with fuch weapons as came first to their hands, and hearing what wonders this Stranger had done, and that it was to his Valour alone they owed the fafety of their Prince, and fig his fair Daughter, they faluted him with shouts of Joy, but his thoughts were an so taken up with his love, that he little regarded their applauses, for his mind was ing mortally perplexed for Hero, who, by the fright, and feeing fo much blood shed, was fallen into a swound, but reviving at length, she was put into a Chariot, that flocd by the Forrest fide, and conveyed to the Castle of Sestus. Leander being in his Encounter unknown to her, by reason his Face was all over covered with the ma blood of his Enemies: Armelius, and all with him, entreated him to go with them to the Caftle, to which he feemingly confented, but it growing dark, he took an opportunity, in the Crowd to withdraw himself till he might better consider to manage his love affairs, and so went that night to a Neighbouring Village, where he refreshed himself, and presenting the Master of the house with some Jewels, de. fired him not to let any one know he was there, if enquiry was made, which he premised and performed.

CHAP. III.

Han Leander Justed before the Princes. and won a Rich Diadem, which he presented to Hero with a Letter init, manifesting his love, and overthrew a great number of menthat lag in Ambush to take his life, &c.

Fro, being pretty well come to her felf, made a strict enquiry after her Deliverer, and when the was told he had fecretly withdrawn himfelf, her Eyes could not refrain from I irs, that she had not a convenient opportunity to thank him for her deliverance.y.. more she could not but wonder who this gallant stranger should be, & sent to divers places to enquire after him, sometimes she thought it could be none but the Famed Leander, but those thoughts again were dashed with the considerations he was passed over to Europe, and taken up there with the welconic of his Triumphs, during these Cogications; and still fixing his Idea in her mind, great thews of joy were need in the Castle for the happy deliverance; and at the end of them a folemn Tilt and Turnament was ordered, wherein he that

jev

hir

Of the two Unfortunate Lovers, Hero and Leander.

did best, were to have a Golden Carronet set with Diamonds and other Precious ough jewels, which Glorious Sport of Martial Prowess was proclaimed by the Heraulds. prize and it soon reached Leanders ear, and whereupon, not to be behind hand, lefe e that his lodging and Rid to Peteropolis, a famous City near at hand, and there bought him a change of Armor, having in his Shield a flaming heart, on which the Sun darted some Rays upon, through Clouds, with this inscription, She, for whom I suftheir fer, is ignorant of my love.

Leander, thus accoursed, took his opportunity to come to the lift, just as the Trumpets were founding to the Action, and found divers Champions in a readine's well mounted who, up in the Signal, run two and two together, and broke their Lances with divers Successes, many being laid in the dust; but, above all the Prince of Perfopolis, who was Enamoured of the fair Here, and to whom her Father deand figned to Wed her unhorsed all that came near him, and, though he was a man of were an Ill-temper, and little beloved by any glorying in his Atchivements, in a bravwas ing manner, came and demanded the Prize, as his due unels any other Knight hed, would dare to attempt any thing further against him. Leander, who had all this while food still that he might be Crowned with the greater Victory, ill endured by those he had foiled, and putting spars to his borse, entered the Lift, and dethe manded the combat against him. They no sooner encountered, but the Princewas overthrown together with his Morse, as if he had been driven down, or Thunder

e had

o re weahad

that eing

hem k an r to here

de. 1 he

eliy.es ank

ght ith

elæa ce;

130 lid

ftruck with a mighty Tempet, which difgrace some of his Followers attempting to Retrieve, run the same Rifq, so that in the end, none daring appear against him, the prize was declared his, which he had no looner Received, but he layed it at the feet of his most lovely Hero, telling her, That, above all the world, she alone was morthy of fo fair a Diadem : She modeltly refused it, and said, It was the prize of his Valour; but he, urging his Forces, inforced by her Beauty, had made him accomplish what otherways he was not capable of doing, he at last urged so long, that the declared the would keep it for his fake. Many Admired at this, some with wonder, and others not without jealousie, all admiring what this might mean. Prince Armelius was well pleased with it, as imagining this Stranger could be no other that this Gallant Deliverer, and, the justs being ended, he caused a Lord near him to go and invite him into the Hall, where a fumptuous Entertainment was prepared but Leander, who had his Face all this while covered, and not yet willing to disclose himself, returned the Prince his humble thanks in the most obliging expressions imaginable, and desired to be excused, saying, He had taken his repalt already, and obliged himself by promise, to return as soon as the Sports were over.

fer

dr

an

the

H

of

€01

L

pe

da

ax

go

40 ar

tr

90 th

fu

CC

in

m ft.

m

I his speech satisfied the Prince, in that he ever held that a man of Honour is ever tyed to his word, but the Prince of Persopolis, inwardly grieving that this Stranger should carry away the prize, and Glory of the day, and being also jealous by the Act on he beheld, that he might prove a Rival in his Love, he being passionately Enamoured of the sair Hero, and had sought many occasions to make his love known to her, which she minded not, or, rather not Regarded, he being the proudest and most ambitious of all men, it turned him to Mortal hatred to Leander, and watching his departure, he sent 12 of his Followers after him to set upon him, & when they had murthered him, to bury him privately that it might not be known.

These men knowing the ways of the Countrey, crossing the nearer ways, got before him, and planted themselves closely in a Wood he was to pass, out of which Ambush they all on a sedden burst upon him with their drawn Swords, and gave himsa surious Assault; but he, who was never used to fear, was not at all daunted, recoiling his Horse a little, to get out of the inclosure, drew his trusty Sword, that had never sail'd him, and flourishing it in their Eyes, like a dreadful Commet that threatned death and destruction, he set upon them with such sury, that he selled them as if a Whirl wind had thrown down a row of stately Cedars from some Mountains top, so that hewing off Arms and legs, and sometimes Heads, in spite of their attempting to sly, he sent Eleven of them to keep company with the Dead, while he that remained, though much wounded, sell on his Knees and begged his life which he generously gave him, upon his submission and Consession, at which, Leander could not but wonder how any Noble Man could be guilty of such baseness, and then commanding him to rise, Go, wretched Man, said he, and tell thy Master that Treachery never prospers, and I wear a Sword that may one day let him see the difference between true Manhood, and such Inglorious Acts as these.

The trembling man, glad his life was given him, having by, Leander's order, dragged his flain Companions into the wood, with much thankfulness took his leave and relating the fatal miscarriage, and what-Leander had given him in charge, put the Prince of Persopolis into an extraordinary rage, so that he stormed & cursed the skies, & his own misfortunes, in which fret we will leave him, and return to Hero.

CHAP. IV.

How when the fair Hero read Leanders letter, she was transported with Joy, and fent Amarissa her Nurse, in search of him, with a letter the wrose to him. How be be a cruel Beast, and saved the Woman that came in search of him, and his Amorous alf course of Hero, &c.

(7 Ou have heard how Hero had received the present of Leander, which she curioufly furveying, perceived in the Curious Needlework, that adorned the Cap of it, a little role of paper thrust in; which she eagerly, but not without blushing, took out, and read in these words:

ting

inst

edit

was fhis

om:-

hat vith

ince

her

him

aring

ing

al-

e-

Π-

by n-

Ve

u-

r,

n,

n.

eh

re

1,

BE

E

[-

le

e

1,

S

5

Fairelt of Creatures, Is it not without cause, that all, who cast their Eyes on you, besome Lovers and Admires of your Noble Perfections. Pardon methon, if, among the reft I have presumed to gaze on so bright an Object, which has not only dazled my oper bus penetrated my heart, and enflamed it with a desire to ferve you, my life and fortuner, Madam, I humbly lay at your feet, and, by my Obedience, if permitted by you, and to beranked among the number of your Adorers, hope to gain some little spark of your condescending goodness to pitty me, and give me at least your good Esteem, when you come to know when your Faithful and Constant Servant is, who now can no longer call himfelf bis own, but made beg leave to subscribe himself your entirely devoted Leannet.

The Princess reading this Letter, paused, and blushed, but, when coming lower, and having cast her eyes upon the Name of Leander, Oh! Heavens, how was file transported, her eyes sparkled with Joy, and she cryed out as in an extale : Ob you Powers above, how do you overload me with happiness, was it then the brave Leander that I beheld with such wonder, who made me this present, and was no doubt my deliverer.

for who but so Noble a Prince could be capable of such Glorions Actions.

As the was thus transported, Amoriffa came in, and finding her in fuch adiforder could not but be very inquifitive into the Caufe, and feeing her hold a parte all in her hand, to which the name of Leander was affixed, the foon underflood the meaning, and joyned in the joy with her young mistress, who embracing her in her Armes, cryed out, O Amariffa now the gracious confiellations of light flower bappy fluances on my Fortune, the brave Leander, on whom my heart is fo entirely fixed, fixed, me for love, as by the Tennor of this letter appears. Amorilla was over joyed that the treublelome.

troublesome part she was to undertake in going to Leander on her mistresses behalf. ia fri and finding a way out to make that love known, which she saw so visibly torment her, and would no doubt have brought her to her Grave, was now fo generously prevented, yet being of a prompt wit, she began to doubt whether this might be ar she Vood the true Leander, or some that might use so gallant a name, on trust to introduce his affection, For had it been he, faid she to Hero, who changed colour and looked satiate pale at this Suspicion, why did he so suddainly withdraw himself, he need not have feared acceptance in your Fathers Court, his glory and renown would have made all proud of the nadel bonour of his Company: Yet, again, said the, recollecting her self, it miy be ke, since as 1 remember, when he passed by in his triumphant Chartot, he looked languishing when he fixed them on your face, and seemed to say, that love from your fair eyes, had sent his Dares to conquer him, who had subdued whole Nations.

Between these hopes and fears, Hero knew not what to fay or think, however it was agreed between them, that Amoriffa, should go in search of the Renowned Here, and know if it was the true Leander or not, before any other Presents or Tenders of Love should be received from him, for to him, alone she had vowed her Virginity, with all her love and Chast Affections, and if she found it to be him, to deliver an answer to his letter, which she wrote in these words.

Sir, Though you are a Stranger, with whom I never had any Conversation, yet the Pame of Leander's Virtues and Renowned Deeds, which have taken up the Discourse of the world, cannot, you may well imagine, but have reached the ears of Hero, and created in her an esteem, worthy of so deserving a person; but how you could conceive so great a pession as you expressed in your letter, upon so slight a view, I cannot hastily believe, since she greatest, Queen on Earth, would be proud of Leander's Cour fhip, and fet a Diadem on bis head for love, I think if I mistake not, I owe my life, at least my liberty, or my benour, which is dearer to me than both, so your Valour, and therefore in gratifude resurn you my thanks, and cannot but declare, that it is just when I am an Enemy to Leander that I be fo to my felf: The rest I leave to the Bearer, in whom you may enti cly repose any confidence, and fo I take leave to subscribe my felf.

Yours in Friendship and good Wishes. Hero. Amerific delayed not to go in this fearch, and having feen which way this Cavilcer went, the mounted upon a white Steed, and riding to be as little observed as might be, happened to light on the way he went, and enquiring of divers Peafants, got some information that such a like Person, as she described, had entered the Wood before her, about three hours fince: this gladed Amoriffe, who scowred fter as nimble as the Wind, but coming between the broad spreading Trees that made a thick shade, and a kind of a Gloom at Noon day, she began to be fearful, the being alone, some thieves or Wild Beasts might assault her; however her fears were not fo great, but the resolved to go on, and did so, till the came to the place

ro: st

a:ce

Wood

mufa

which pring

Armo

met,

ing, a ready

pose l

o do

made

troal

If he Fight had been, where feeing the grafs &leaves crimfon'd with blood, the flarted ent la fright, and almost fell from her Horse, and being a little recovered, was de-My ros stoturn him, but he head ftrongly leaped forward, carryed her away by force: ar the ha! not Rid in this speed, but she heard a Monster terribly Roaring in the Vood, who having scented the blood of the flain, was making towards them, to ice satiste his Hungry Maw, but upon hearing the noise of her Horses track, she had ed arce passed the place where he was, but he came running to the Edge of the ed Wood, and putting our his dreadful head through the Buthes, which afrightment nade her redouble her speed, yet after her he came full cry, which chappy for he he musual found piercing the Ears of Leander, as he fat under a spreading Beech. which he had tyed his Horse, to refresh himself after so much Toyle, and at a small pring, which there bubled up, to wash off the blood and dust from his face and er Armour, which had befincered thein in the Combate, whereat, claping on his Held met, he came unto the way, with his drawn Sword, and perceived a Woman five or ing, and crying for help as the fled before a monsterous Beast, whose Jams were already bloody, with the Prey he had already torn, which made him hall to interpose his never unsuccessful Sword, between her and death, which he scarce had time to do, e're the Cruel Monster was come so near, as to make a full leapar her, which made her, through fear, fall from her Horsein a swound, so that milling her, he tore and rent the Horse in a miserable manner, before Leander could gire him a ful troak, which, however, at length he did, with fach force, that it gave him a deep wound in his neck, which made him the more eager, and with great fury can at Leander, rearing himself, upon his hinder paws, and fretching out his forwar ones to catch him in his grafp, whereupon, with a home thrust followed close had coming in between them he pierced his Breast, and so his heart, that he sell dow uch dead, with a dismal cry: When he had done this, he came to Amorissa and reare her (who now began again to recover her fenses) demanding what adventure ha brought her such a dangerous way: At these words, rearing her eyes, and fixing raem upon him, she immediately knew him to be the same that had won the Priz ar Sestus, and the man she was in search after, whereupon she fell at his feet, and inbracing his knees with tears of Joy in her eyes, faid: Sure Heaven is this day fa imable to me, and to the fair Hero, in delivering me from death, and, as I hope

Disting an end to a more tedious fearch.

Leander, when he heard the name of Hero, started, and a little after recovering himself again, took Amorissa in his arms, and tenderly embracing her, said : For t Heavens fake let me bear that Heavenly found again, I think (continued he) you name. Hero. Idid fo, my Lord, replyed she, and hope you are Leander. I am so, said he sons but what is the canfe of your venturing alone this desolate way. Infearch of you faid she im, Of me, replyed Leander, hastily, to what end I pray? You Read that said she, and you out way be better informed: Whereupon the gave him the Letter, that Hero had write lero te no fooner faw her name, but bending one knee to the Earth, he kissed the Palnd h per a hundred times, before his words could get utterance, and then faid he: He tabl the Immortal Powers fo great a Regard to Leander, as to inspire the Breast of the Fail nex Beariful, and Virtuous Hero; Speak, Speak, I Says for thou art my good Angel, I think rica the bringest me these glad Tidings: And with that he thrust a Jewel of great value ema into her hand, for bringing him the happy news. To which Amoriffa modest le he le replyed, that if he was really that Leander of Greece, who passed some days fixed tome Triumphant over the Hellespone, the had a Commission (if Here had any power over t be him, as in his Letter he expressed she had, to let him know, that she had no light e-her, freem of him, and that he might hope to be happy, in her love.

blush If that may be, said he, I am the happyest Man on Earth. It was my fear of offending ber with my passon, that made me thus twice retire: First when I had rescued her in Judg the Wood, and now, which cannot but grieve me, because it had almost proved fatal to you. Tece But think you, continu'd he, I may be so over bleffed to see my Hero alone, and presume ment to tell ber of my love, without interruption, or without offending her.

Amorifa undertook this, and gave him Encourgement, this his Enterprize should the be Crowned with Success, but that he carry on his Love as privately as might be, the for that Alramanfor, Prince of Persopolis, had declared himself a lover of the Princes wha Here, and by reason of the Power he had in that Country, and the Ascendant over com the Father of her Miltress, might much obstruct their Loves, if not make it prove of.

Seltu

be ero

go

Of the two Unfortunate Lovers, Hero and Leander.

ha kin

riz

o!

-15

fatal consequence. To all, this Leander consented, and gave himself wholly up be conducted by her management, yet concealed from her the design Aleananclose had upon him by Treachery, though she was inquisitive, if he knew, how so dow uch blood came spilt in the Road.

CHAP. V.

their Lives, and of the mutual Agreement they made, and how Leander prepared to go to Sestus, to gain her Fathers consent.

ring THE Joyful Leander now resolved to go to Sestus with more willingness. he went to reap Lawrels and Triumphs, took Amoriffa (whole he fonfter had killed) up behind him, and croffing a nearer way, tha the im, Rid through all the By-paths, till they came to a little Country-loc y out half a Mile from the Palace, where there was a Curious Garden, to which richero nsed, in the cool of the Evening, to Resort, of this place he had the Keys. pand here they Entred, and shewed him to put his Horse and Armour in a Vaulted He table under-ground, that they might not be discovered, if any body should come Fairnexpected with the Princess, and carried him to a curious shady Arbour, so inricately winding and turning, and flut up with leaves and Trees, that those who aludemained in the Remotest part, could not be without difficulty discerned. fil he lest him, with a promise that she would so order it; that the fair Hero should te come thither, without knowing of his being there, least otherwise file might thinks ver t beyond the Rules of Modesty, to meet a Man, that was so great a Strange to eher, though she loved him never so entirely, thus she dissembled to Leander, but oing to her Mistress, she told her all that had happened, who could not bus nd blush, she had made such promise in her name, refusing for some time to go, as in Judging it might be interpreted as too much fondness, but Amoriffa urging it, as on recessary in this Juncture, to prevent discovery, and laying aside her bich carme ments, put on a disguise, and so passing through the back Garden of the Castle of Sestus, through a little Wicket, that was shaded by a Tuft of Trees, they got into ild the Field, and so to the little Lodge, where Leander waited with Impatiency, e. the coming of his bright Angel, and employed all his thoughts in meditating i es what manner he should Accost her; but, whilst they lasted, he elpyed Amore er coming, and in her Company one, who, by her Garb he knew not what to this ve of, as imagining it could not be his Adored Princess, but, spon a nearer approach her beauty, like an Angels brightness, shot through those seeming Clouds and almost consounded him with Amazement, that nothing before could danne So near a Kin is Love to Impotency, that it disarms us of Courage, and enseeble the strongest and most daring Resolution. Shotook a turn or two in the Walks and when she came near the Arbor, where he was, he ventured out, and, with a low submission, falling at her seet, and (whilst she slood almost consounded with Blushes and Amazement) thus expressed himself:

Pardon me, Divinest Creature, if I thus presume to prostrate my self before you, i bepes, that so much Goodness can pardon a Crime of a higher Nature, and especially this, feeing it is Authorised by Love, a hofe commands must be obeyed, and whose flume are in refiftable. O turn not away those duzling Sues of light the t gu de me to my happi nels but let those Orient Eyes shine upon me with beams of Comfort, that I may live by the brightness of their Rays, and by the Smiles of my Fair Hero. He would have proceeded, but Here intreating him to rife, and Ameriffa advising them to go into the Arbor, as well to keep them from the Heat, as from the prying eyes that might be son them; the two Lovers obeyed, being both, without any farther Ceremonies, overjoyed at so happy a meeting, though Hero diffembled it as well as the could, telling him, whill he gently squeezed her fair Hand, which she permitted him to Kifs, that, the hoped he would not misconstrue her Actions, in being fo forward in granting him Favours she had never yet done to any body, fince, in gratitude, she could do no less, seeing he had been her Deliverer, but to grant him Love, which he earnestly requested, she must take a longer time to consider or it, before the absolutely fixed, or settled her Affections; though The must confess, his Merits required a greater Beauty, and a larger Fortune. Leander, hereupon, promised to obey her in all things, so that (the giving him very large hopes of winning those Affections, which, indeed, she had intir ly fixed por him before) it was agreed, that the next day he should make his publick appearance at the Castle of Seftus , but to be very cautious how he made Love to her publick, or shewed the least sign of it, till she knew how her father stood indin'd to favour him, for, tho' she loved Leander entirely, yet she much relyed mon her Obedience wher Parents, which proved very Tragical as will in the end appear.

ouds daunt eeble

Valks

with:

unded

011, 31

cctull

A ine

וקקוום ive by have

o go

s that rther

well

o the

ions, ody, but

simil ough

une. him

ixed

apher

10lyed The 13,

CHAF. VI.

Leander's Fatal Dream, and the Treachery of the Prince of Persopolis, to oppose bis love. Heros Father entertains him with Joy, yet denys bis Confent, in favour of the Prince of Persopolis, and other Rare Advemores.

HE best and constant of lovers having had this Mutual Satisfaction of an Enterview, and, in their hearts, inseperably linked by the Chains of leve. Hero and Amoriffa retired, and Leander resolved to take up his Abode, fee the Sun was near set, in that Lodge, till the next morning, when after many thoughts coming in his head, he fell afteep, and fancied he had fair Here in his Arms, dancing on the Waves, and riding Triumphant in Negiune's Charice as if commanding the Seas, till Solut, the god of the Wind, conspired, with all his force, to raise a mighty and prodigious Storm, which our-fet his Sh Triumphant; whereat, for fear of losing Here, who seemed to roul (with him) on the watery Surges; he started, and awoke, much troubled at such an unusua Dream; but concluding it only the fancy of the night, and of his extraordinary Love, he hushed those Cares, and set his mind intent how to dispose himself the next day; he had forgotten to tell Here how he had been fet upon by Alten Treachery, and knew he would not only appose him in his love, but make a practifes upon him, wherefore he found it was convenient to be warey.

Day approaching, he layed his Armour in a fafe place, and took only his Hot and went to the Castle of Sestus, where, the Bridge being down, and the Oat open, he entered, and took him a secret I dging in a little House, in the Remone eft Place, where Amoriffa often vifited him, and divers letters poffed beneen him and his fair Mistress, and sometime he was privately let into her ledgin where, in the end, their hearts became so firmly united, that they enjoyed in manner of innocent freedom, so that Here, at length, resolved that, if the could gain her Fathers Confent, the would, without further delay, Marry Leaders pass over into Greece with him, where, besides his Castle, he had large Lands Territories, but, as she thought to do it, and just going to sprak of the matter, he prevented it, by laying his Commands upon her to entertain Alses enfers love, with which she had been a long time per secuted, but ever flighted and dispised, he layed before her the Advantage of fuch an Alliance, the power and riches of that I rince, and many other mutters, but the answered him only with her sears, and entreatys, that the might not have a Man the could not Affect; this made the Old-man in a great Rage, protesting not only to disown her, but disuberit her for ever, if the difobe, ed him. This xews the fent Learder in a letter, all blotted with her tears, which made him for a time like a man befide himf. If, but refolving to hazard all for his Mistress, he concluded to appear like himself, and demand, or despute her against Altemansor, and so, in the most kich Attire, which he sent for out of Grace, he appeared one of the most goodly. Persons that ever had been seen in the Court, so that all admired who this Stranger should be, till. Heros Father one day cating his Eyes upon him as he passed by, run to him with tears in his eyes, crying out: O my Deliverer, and my good Angel, have I sound your again, bewis is that you left us, after you had faved our lives from a Death that was fo near us! Leander made modest Excuses on this Account, saying: It was no more than in Honour be pught to have done. And if the Oldernan was transported, now he was the more abundantly, so when he knew it was Prince Leander, he carryed him into his Pallace, shewed him all his starities, and made great Feasting for several Days desiring him to demand of him whatever was in his power to wige him, and he would do it for him.

ving

and,

fent

been

Fan his min.

Leander thought now was his time in this height of Carrelles, said: Sir, for all the Favour's you have done me, and for the Offers you have made me, I return you my most humble thanks; there is but one thing in the World I desire of you, and if I could but think you would grant me that, I would freely demand it.

Demand then (said he) boldly, and whatever it is, expect it. It is then, said Leander, your leave to serve the Process Hero. At which he fraced and looked pair, protessing had he not already promis dher to Aleemansor, there was no man under Heaven that he would more gladly have bestoned her on, than Leander, whose same and Worth had sussiciently spread over Asia and Europe, but having some to give her him before the high Ahar, he could not go back with his word, or, if he should, he being Pome ful in this Parts, would take her by force, and lay his sinheritance wost. But Leander told him, that should never be whilst he more a Sword. But no entreaties could prevail with him for his consent: and Hero having promised to dye rather than Mariy any but Leander, though she stood stiffy upon her Obediense Leander knew not what to think, but coming to his fair Mistress, very sad and penander knew not what to think, but coming to his fair Mistress, very sad and penander knew not what to think, but coming to his fair Mistress, very sad and penander knew not what to think, but coming to his fair Mistress, very sad and penander knew not what to think, but coming to his fair Mistress, very sad and penander.

five made her the forrowful lamentacion, who thereupon hung about his neck a over flowed with tears; and gave him fresh Allurance of her love and constancy whereupon he told her the Freachery of Alternaufor, and that neither himself nor the were sife on that Shore, but that, if she would go with him into Greece secretly, he would Marry her Royally there, but she still insisted upon her Obedience, and told him, that time might mollisse her Fathers heart.

ach

th

ady

iro

W

CHAP. VII.

How Prince Altemanior suborned one to Poyson Leander, and how he was prevented; and how seeming to assissant him, he slew him and his company, upon which he was forced to swim the Hellespont, whilst Hero was confined to a Tower, whither, guided by her light, he often visited her by night, and attempting to fetch her away, was drownded, where upon she leaped into the Sea.

D Y this time the News of Leander's coming to Court, being known to Allemanfor. Dine Person that had escaped, having told him it was the same that overthrew. him at Turnament, and had destroyed his men in the Wood, he, was greatly exraged, but when he had secret notice he pretended to Love his Mistress, he imputed all the Rigorous ulage of Hero towards him, arising from the love she had to this new-come Stranger, ∴ feeing open force had failed, he refolved that ficret Mischief should take place, and so with a great sum of Gold, hired one of Leanders Servants, (that he had newly hire'd) to poylon him with a glass of Wine, but as son as he was putting it towards his lips it flew to pieces, whereat the Wretch teeing his Treechery discovered, fell on his knees, begging pardon, and disclosed the whole matter, upon which this and the former Treachery was published to the Disgrace and Anger of Attemanfor. Hero's Father was much displeased with this. and fent fharply to reprove him, which made him rage the more, and vow revenge. knowing Leander to be a Prince of great Courage, and having fuffi. ently tryed his strength, he durst not challenge him to the Combite, but though if he could my ways destroy him, it would open his way to Here's love, wherefore one night he broke into his Lodging with about twenty men, which creating some noise, Leander, who had not time to put on his Cloaths, got his Sword, and defended himfelf so well, that he killed the Prince and most of his Followers, which so Alarmed the Caftle, that all were up in Arms, when Leander fearing to be oppressed, or that revenge would be taken for this proud Prince, made his retreat, good, with the Slaughter of his Enemies, and getting to a Window, that jutted into the Sea, leap-Into the Waves, and directing his Course by the Stars, swam with full revenge. the Shoar of Greeia, and fafely arrived at Abidas, he thought for these many TreachOf the two Unfortunate Lovers, Here and Leander.

OF

etce, the secrety of his love, and desire not more to offend Here's Father, who was advoutragions for the Death of Alternar for, he desisted that resolve, he sent a ty Servant to hear how things were resented, who told him at his return, that sair Mistress was confined, by her Father, to a little Tower that justed into the from the Castle, and there mourned her Captivity, and his a brence.

whereupon he got two of his trusty Servan's to row him ever in a life Be ache night time, and being furnish t with a ladder of rope, come safe under the wind & calling with a low voice Amorific who waited upon her Mistress soon heard and by his Direction, let down a line of thread, and drawing up the ladder, and it to the beam of the Window, mounted by it. Here who was burjust and it to the beam of the Window, mounted by it. Here who was burjust and it to the beam of the Window, mounted by it. Here who was burjust and the taken, to Deliver him up to Alternamfors Brother, to be punished, if Leander like taken, to Deliver him up to Alternamfors Brother, to be punished, who was need and as blood thinsty as the other had been, so that, after many kisses, and combraces, Leander, in a passionate manner, endeavoured to persuade there take her escape, with him, to Abidos; but she resided it, so that, in a is mer, by stealth; as it were, he came often to visit her; the fitting up, in the dark of Night, a Torch Light, in the Window, to giuid him to the Tower, the heard the killing News, that her Father had defigned to Marry her, with three days, though she had opposed it with her tears and prayers, to Babaz. Brother to Albemansor, to prevent a War, and to Atone for his Brothers Dear This satal Decree possessed Leander with Mortal Fears, so that she, seeing no hop but either to destroy herself, or be forced into the Arms of a man she hated, the Leander's proflered Aid in case of VVar, would not be accepted by her Father, seeing no hop consented the next night he should come with a small Ship to go fetch her and An issae, with all her Jewels and Treasure, into Greece. The over-joyed Leander we back to prepare a vessel, which he foon did, and caused it to be drawn in betwee two Rocks, lest his purpose might be discovered to the other shore, 'till it we know you when himself being weary, and lying down to slumber, he was sudday a waked by a Melodious Song, sung by two Maremaids, who appeared dancion the VVaves.

22

The Famous and Renowned History

SONG.

Awake, Leander, see the Skys Do in Blackest Tempests rise: in Neptune's Watery Kingdom, see,
Two Lovers shall Entombed be;
Whose hard Mishap, the Sea Gods all,
With us, lament their Funeral:
The Cruel Ghosts Revenge do crave,
And Fate Decrees them to their Grave.

We pitty Lovers that are crost,

And in their highest Hopes so lost;

When nearest to their Joys they seem,

And find all but a Golden Dream.

Then do Cross Winds bear away

Their bopes; Leander, prithee stay:

But the too forward Fates drive on,

By Love, the best of Lovers are undone.

Lean fost

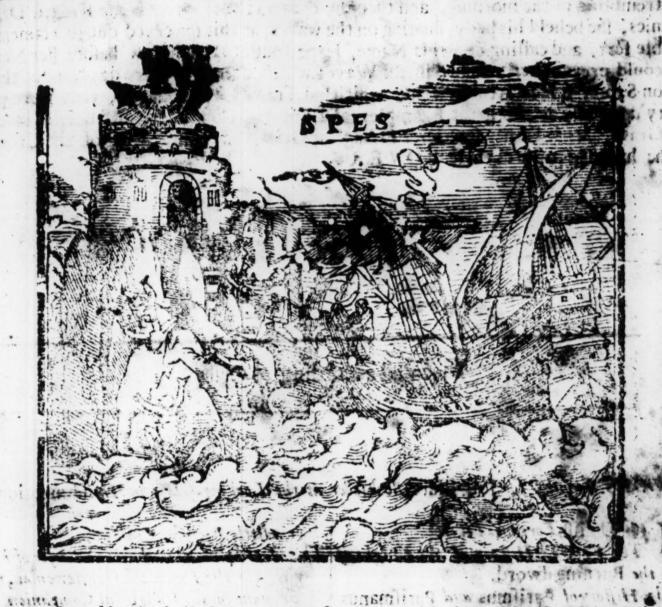

her

toth

Of the two Unfortunate Lovers, Hero and Leander.

23

Leander hearing this, as it were, between fleep and wake, much admir'd ir, and and a little trouble and heaviness in his mind, however, he resolved to keep his ord at any rate, but, about Sun set, a mighty Tempest arose, the sea swelled Terror, all seemed a suddain midnight, when as, going towards the Vessel, he received it had broke its Cable, and had driven our to sea, with those men that were on Board it, he hailed them as loud as he could, but they flood awayibe fore the VVind, and could not get back, then he run about the chore to feek and ther Vessel but could find rone, so that seeing the light in Here's larget, by which he knew the expected him, he resolved to run any hazard than break his worth and so stripping himself to his thirt, and hiding his Cloaths in the Rock, he learether to the swelling Main, in hopes to overtake the Vessel, or find it at the place appointed.

ean

aba

Dea

her, id Ander we let would did ancient pointed, and so hoated on the VVaves, till he was half Sea over, when, as if the Elements had conspired his ruin, Rain, Thunder, Lightning and Windbandyed him from wave to wave, calling to Heaven, and on sair Heros name, dashing among the Rocks on the other side, he lost his Noble Life, and He who had impatiently expected him all that night with greedy eyes, dooked a trembling in the morning, and there by the too Cruel Fate of the Ridged Del nies, she beheld his body, soating on the waves, at this she cryed out in a lament ble fort, and calling upon his Name, leaped out at the window before her Nur could prevent her, perished in the Waves, which after they were dead, drove the on Store, folded Arm in Arm, which sad Trajedy being known, they were piny d by all, as the great Examples of Love and Constancy, and Buried in of Grave, Heros Father soon after Dying for Grief, in consideration of the Cruei he had used towards these LOVERS.

FINIS

Licensed according to Order.

ROOKS Trinted for Jos. Blare Bookseller at the Looking-Class on London-bridge

The Famous History of, the Knight of the Burning-fword.

Tie History of Parismus and Parismanus

Ayrle's Arithmetick.

The Complent English Scretary and newest Accademy of Complements.

Rustell's Seven Sermens.

Aufill's Companion for Children & Tonin, or a little Book for Children.

The Accomplished Ladys Rich Closet of Rarities, or the Ingenious Gentlewoman, & Sexuant maids Delightful Companion. The Famous History of the Gentle-Crast. At the Place above mentioned, Country Chapmen are Furnished with all forts of BOOKS, Bound or Stitch'd, Small BOOKS and BALLADS.

D X F 36la

105673

REPRODUCTO THOM THE ORIGINAL IN THE METER E. PUNT NOICH LICKARY PARO AT TO LERY FOR KETERS LE CILY. - PERMISSION NECESTARI FOR REPRODUCTION.

win me, d Ha red o Del ment Nun

e the ere pi in or Cruck ridge

of Ra en, c ft.

untry oks